Professional Experience

Administrative and Governance Appointments

Vice-Chair of the Faculty Senate, Ohio University, June 2020-May 2022

The Faculty Senate, as sanctioned by the Ohio University Board of Trustees, is an elected representative body that acts on behalf of all faculty on matters related to University planning, governance, and resource allocation. As Vice Chair, I:

- Presided at meetings of the Senate, and otherwise fulfilled the duties and obligations of the chair, at the request of the chair or in the event of their absence.
- Coordinated academic policy and procedures affecting faculty and students with the Office of the Provost, Enrollment Management, Registrar, Financial Aid, and other administrative units to promote student service and financial efficiencies while protecting academic freedom and educational and research excellence.
- Served as the voting chair of the University Curriculum Council supervising: the addition, relocation, and deletion of academic programs and degrees; the schedule of program review and the review process itself; after formal review, the quality

- and priority of existing academic programs; addition, deletion, and changes in courses; academic program or department name changes and addition, deletion, and changes of master curriculum file, and major codes; academic requirements; and, implementation and maintenance of the General Education program.
- With the Provost (co-chair of the Academic Policy and Process Group) created policies for new academic calendaring; documenting teaching effectiveness and providing alternative evidence in a COVID period; Adjusting research, scholarship, and creative activity requirements for promotion and tenure; Clarifying final examination expectations and processes for remote learning; Recommended class attendance policies to account for isolation and quarantining; Accommodating incomplete grades for both experiential and classroom-based learning; and, Admissions procedures for transfer assurance guidelines, remote laboratory courses, home schooling evidence, and transcription and grading requirements. Special foci on crafting policies for student-centered and COVID-adjusted scholarships and financial aid procedures; withdrawal dates, fee adjustments, advising and registration dates; and, standards for academic probation, dean's list requirements, and Latin honors.

Chair, Institutional Review Board, Office of the Vice President for Research, Ohio University, July 2020- present; Vice-Chair, July 2010-June 2020

As Chair of the Social-Behavioral Research Institutional Review Board, I am responsible for assuring that all research involving human participants will comply with the Terms of Assurance for Protection of Human Subjects for Institutions within the United States and that research is guided by the ethical principles regarding research involving human participants as set forth in the Belmont Report and related guidance materials. Specifically, I:

- Collaborated with Office of Research Compliance and Office of Information Technology staff to select and begin implementation of a Cayuse research administration system, from crafting the RFP to implementation testing phase.
- In the context of COVID-19 created, in cooperation with the Chair of the Biomedical Research IRB, policies and procedures for conducting safe and effective face-to-face research.
- Maintain a thorough understanding of federal regulations pertaining to human subject protections, IRB Policies and Procedures, and other applicable institutional policies, state, and local regulations and assure that regulations and policies are applied in all IRB matters with a commitment to foster ethically and scientifically sound human subject research.
- Review adverse event reports and unanticipated problems/protocol deviations to determine if the event affects the safety of subjects and, the conduct of the trial.
- Determine courses of immediate action to address the safety of subjects; and if necessary and in consultation with the Institutional Official, convene an emergency meeting of the IRB with the assistance of the Office for Research Compliance.
- Develop and revise, as appropriate, policies and procedures in conjunction with the Institutional Official and the Office of Research Compliance. As appropriate, the revisions are reviewed and approved by the IRB fully convened meeting.

- Evaluate, with the Institutional Official and the Office of Research Compliance, whether the number of IRBs and members of each Board is appropriate to the volume and types of human research being reviewed, so that reviews are accomplished in a thorough and timely manner.
- Review IRB administrative personnel and budget on an annual basis with the Institutional Official to suggest modifications in space, facilities, and staff as necessary to accommodate the volume and types of research reviewed.

Coordinator for Global Outreach, School of Communication Studies, Ohio University,
July 2017-June 2020

As Coordinator for Global outreach, I was responsible for developing international and global teaching, research, and service opportunities for students and faculty.

Accomplishments include

- In cooperation with the Graduate College, negotiated a Document of Understanding with the Higher Education Commission of Pakistan to participate in the US-Pakistan Knowledge Corridor PhD Scholarship Program. This program permits Ohio University to access over $1,100,000,000 (one billion, one hundred million) as part of an effort to educate 10,000 Pakistani scholars at the doctoral level at US universities in next ten years to train its faculty resources in identified subject areas.
- In cooperation with the Silk Road Initiative in the People's Republic of China, I secured an invitation for the Scripps College for potential building of a new facility and a joint program between OU and a new Tier 1 University in China. This included the offer to build Scripps a $20 million facility to our specifications.
- Successfully wound-down the Ohio U-Bangkok U doctoral program. Students (successfully completed their dissertations and were represented by appropriate faculty at their defenses; delivered, at the 2018 commencement, the graduate address for the joint programs.
- Deepened our relationship with the University of Manizales in Colombia; initiated first candidate for capacity-building for U de M faculty; planned the Communication in the Americas IV symposium.
- Increased the involvement of COMS and the Scripps College in programming that involves the Pontifical Catholic University of Ecuador; coordinated delegation from PUCE to OU and Scripps in Spring 2018; eight research projects among Scripps, the Heritage College of Osteopathic Medicine, and PUCE were initiated; includes development of $139,342 in external funding.
- Initiated relationship with the University Teknologi Mara (in Malaysia) for communication units at Ohio University; provided supporting documentation to allow UiTM to invite COMS faculty to serve on doctoral committees.
- In partnership with the Education USA Foundation in Nepal, secured interest and contact information for 2300 Nepalese prospective students at both the undergraduate at graduate levels. The School's approximately $2,500 investment in this activity produced a return equivalent to $62,100 for the University, with a specific return to the Scripps College.
- Secured invitation from Education USA Foundation in India for Scripps College recruiting in India's virtual fair. This is an invitation only online event that connected the Scripps College and COMS to approximately 8,000 high-income, high-English Indian students interested in graduate programs in the United States. Income generation of $216,000 in leads for an expense of ~$1,000.

- In partnership with the US Education Foundation in Pakistan, planned and executed recruiting for high-income, high-English Pakistani students interested in undergraduate and graduate study in the United States. Were the only US university participating that has been identified for communication and media rather than for business and engineering. Income generation and will be equivalent to returning $137,700 in leads for an expense of ~$3,500.
- With other Scripps faculty recruited students into study away programs in Ecuador, including the public health program, the biological sciences program by, and the communication program.

Associate Director for Graduate Studies, School of Communication Studies, Ohio University, July 2010-2017, August 2024-present

As Associate Director, I was responsible for managing 40+ graduate students as teaching personnel and overseeing curriculum activity in the School associated with graduate education. In this role, I oversaw and evaluated all Communication Studies graduate students as employees of the University. School accomplishments that I led as Associate Director include:

- Revision (2025-2026) of doctoral program including proposal and approval of revised curriculum to better meet student needs, support persistence and completion, and promote programmatic efficiencies in delivery; revised area structure to better fit faculty teaching power, post-completion market needs and student learning needs; revised comprehensive examination process to better align with assessment needs and professional preparation and desired competencies of students; removal of portfolio requirement to reduce barriers to student success and completion and to reduce faculty workload; and, a professional seminar requirement for advanced pedagogy for students interested in teaching beyond Public Speaking.
- Revision (2016-2017) of doctoral program including proposal and approval of revised curriculum to better meet student needs, support persistence and completion, and promote programmatic efficiencies in delivery; revised area structure to better fit faculty teaching power, post-completion market needs and student learning needs.
- Restored program compliance with accreditation requirements and federal, state, and university regulations for prior degree requirements, F- and J-visa students, English proficiency requirements
- In anticipation of a move to Responsibility Centered Management by Ohio University, creation and enactment of plans to (a) increase our School's credit hour production through maximizing weighted student credit associated with graduate student enrolment and (b) encourage the generation of weighted student credit hour enrolments in patterns that recognize and reward faculty involvement in advising and mentoring
- Re-articulation, with the regional campus coordinator, of the regional campus MA

- program from a blended format to an online education format to better serve working students and to increase revenue production
- Expansion of undergraduate Communication Studies online offerings to a full major in the online bachelor's degree completion program offered through e-Learning OHIO by creating memoranda of understanding for new courses in Interpersonal Communication and in Small Group Communication and overseeing their implementations and the expansion of both Public Speaking and Introduction to Human Communication to scalable classes.
- Creation of a four-year rotation of courses to assist with graduate student course planning and faculty equity and access for teaching opportunities
- Conversion of the Ph.D. in Communication Studies and the M.A. in Organizational Communication graduate programs from a quarter system to a semester system
- Proposal and implementation of an interdisciplinary Graduate Certificate Program in Clinical Informatics in coordination with the College of Health Science and Professions
- Proposal of a Preparing Future Faculty Certificate Program in coordination with the Patton College of Education

Chair, Promotion and Tenure Committee of the Faculty Senate, Ohio University, 2016-2017

The Promotion and Tenure Committee oversees appeals related to promotion and tenure. The committee also considers a broad range of issues related to promotion and tenure policies and procedures.

Chair, Educational Policies and Student Affairs Committee of the Faculty Senate, Ohio University, 2015-2016

The Educational Policies and Student Affairs Committee considers issues related to the curriculum, educational policies (including catalog language), and broader issues concerning students. The committee also forms the primary link between the University Curriculum Council and Faculty Senate.

- With University College established process and procedures for approval of experimental degree programs and “stackable” certificates
- With Undergraduate Admissions clarified internal transfer processes from regional campuses and centers to the Athens campus, as well as procedures for non-traditional high school completion equivalencies for admission
- With Office of Civil Rights, created initial draft of policy for disability and accessibility services in online teaching environments
- With the President of the Senate, articulated sections of the Ohio University Faculty handbook to be compliant with Ohio Administrative Code

Scripps College Chair, Faculty & Staff Giving Campaign, Central Committee, Ohio University, 2012-2015

The “Promise Within” Campaign was the faculty-staff portion of Ohio University’s 2012-2015 fundraising campaign. As a member of the Central Committee, I was the Scripps College representative and responsible for promoting internal participation in “The Promise Within.” As the Scripps College Chair, I:

- Assisted University Advancement in planning campaign events and initiatives
- Educated the College and University community about the importance of supporting the Promise Within campaign
- Identified specific designations within the College to target for external support
- Increased Faculty/Staff participation rates in the Scripps College from 12% (2012) to 60% (2015)
- Increased Faculty/Staff total giving in the College from $250,000 (2001) to $1.9 million (2015); this $1.9 million can be compared to total University faculty-staff giving of $3.7 million

Chair, Professional Relations Committee of the Faculty Senate, Ohio University, 2012-2014

The Professional Relations Committee initiates and recommends, reviews, and monitors policies on all matters that affect the professional activities of the faculty of the University. As Chair of the Committee, I was responsible for recommending all-University guidelines for the administration of personnel practices and professional activities as necessary and reviewing the procedures and practices of each school and college, with the exception of tenure cases. Senate accomplishments that I led as Chair include:

- Creation of a Clinical Faculty track for practitioners in the College of Health Science and Professions to support recruitment and retention of preceptors
- Implementation of evaluation procedures for non-tenure track faculty
- Authorization of multi-year contracts for clinical and non-tenure track faculty
- Authorization of promotion in rank of non-tenure track faculty
- Expansion of benefits to include educational benefits for domestic partners

Course Director, Argumentative Analysis and Advocacy, School of Communication Studies, Ohio University, August 2009-June 2021

As Course Director, I:

- Planned, coordinated, and implemented a five-week professional seminar for experienced teaching assistants each year to train graduate students as skilled teachers of argumentation
- Guided textbook selection processes involving other faculty and teaching staff
- Created, with input from TAs, a common syllabus template and transformed the argumentation class from an oral skills-only class to a course emphasizing both oral and written argumentation
- Observed teaching assistants in the classroom and provided feedback and specialized assistance to help students improve their teaching.

Teaching Appointments

Summary of Educational Philosophy

In the classroom and out, it is my goal to assist students in their development into active citizens in their communities. When a student enters a classroom, what they learn from an educator must contribute to their ability to participate in their community. I believe that teaching communication as an art and a practice allows me to provide students with tools for participation in their communities and a forum for enacting such participation. Please see the full statement of educational philosophy at the end of this c.v.

Research Appointments

Summary of Research Philosophy

I self-describe as an applied rhetorician working in the field of health communication. Above the study of communication acts as persuasive devices, I value the exploration of the ethical and social implications of communication acts. Because researchers are members of a larger community of scholars and of humans, I believe the applied rhetorician has the responsibility to contribute positively to their communities. Moreover, applied rhetoricians must be prepared to speak to that community and to audiences that can act as agents of change. Please see the full statement of research philosophy at the end of this c.v.

Statement of Educational Philosophy Benjamin R. Bates

As the Greek teacher of rhetoric Isocrates once said, "There has been no institution devised by humans which the power of speech has not helped us to establish." With Isocrates, I believe that the art and practice of communication is crucial to the development of human communities and that the ability to participate actively in a community is the evidence of an individual's education. In the classroom and out, it is my goal to assist students in their development into active citizens in their communities. When a student enters a classroom, what that student learns from an educator must contribute to their ability to participate in their community. I believe that teaching communication as an art and a practice allows me to provide students with tools for participation in their communities and a forum for enacting such participation.

I believe students should not be asked to study communication simply to answer test questions; they must learn about communication to become better communicators and to participate as citizens. One of the fundamental roles of the educator is to encourage students to apply the concepts that they learn about communication to their life outside the classroom. For effective application, students need a forum within the classroom to test their advocacy practices. To meet these needs, my classes require students to learn more than concepts and theories, but also to enact advocacy that draws upon what they have learned. Depending on the class, different media of advocacy are emphasized, including oral, written advocacy, and video- and computer-mediated advocacy. In each class, I encourage students to work individually and in groups to identify an issue, product, or text of interest, research the issue, and present the issue and their position on it in a public format. Whenever I work to provide a testing ground for advocacy practices, students are asked to consider various theories or concepts in communication, to construct positions and arguments based in their understanding of those theories and concepts, and to practice the art of advocacy. In this way, not only do students explore their individual skills at oral, written, or mediated communication, but they also enhance their positions as advocates, thus contributing to the larger polis. In recent iterations of my undergraduate classes, we have reported to the City of Athens Water Department needs for community access to strong infrastructure, to the City-County Health Department means of connecting children to nutrition and developmental services, and, most recently, to our campus office responding to COVID strategies for engaging students with university messaging for prevention.

The need for this contribution to society is also acute for graduate students. I envision my graduate courses as more than advanced sets of theories and concepts to be learned or enhanced modes of argument construction to be mastered. I believe graduate courses should assist graduate students in becoming producers of knowledge about communication, about a topical area, and about the intersection between communication and that topical area. I ask my graduate students to produce, through individual and/or collaborative effort, a contribution to the ongoing search for new insights, new interpretations, and new understandings of the role that communication plays in substantive issues of health, public policy, or some other topic area and the ways that these topic areas play roles in constructing our communicative practices. I firmly believe that, as academics, we have freedom to think but that we also have a responsibility to share our thinking. At a basic level, this means that graduate students should use the class to make strides toward producing scholarship that can be presented at conferences, published in journals, or distributed to the public through popular outlets. A semester, however, is rarely sufficient to conceptualize, implement, and interpret a study. Therefore, I believe that the graduate instructor cannot stop teaching simply because final exam week has come and gone; the graduate instructor should continuously work with his or her students until the product is as finished as it can be, and as long as both the student and instructor believe that continued work on the project is beneficial to both themselves and to the larger community. As demonstrated by my writing and presentation with multiple students, I have enacted this commitment to going beyond the classroom with my graduate students to establish contributions to the academy.

Skill sets and advocacy abilities are important, and obtaining them may be the reason undergraduate students register for our courses. And, producing papers to be submitted to conferences or for publication to better position themselves for the academic job market may be a primary reason that graduate students enroll. Nonetheless, one of the major aims of communication is to empower undergraduate and graduate students as reflective and critical thinkers so that they may better make decisions as participants in the polis. Students must be assisted in becoming better consumers and producers of discourse – be it oral, written, or electronically mediated – and participants in the better formation of community based on such readings and productions. Critical practice should be encouraged in the classroom through the critique of other student presentations, readings of texts, media products, and other items that can be brought into the classroom for consideration. In an age of a cosmopolis, an array of discourses from multiple cultures and the opportunity to interact with them must be brought to the student, as they will be confronted with them as citizens outside the classroom.

The ability to inspire students as advocates is crucial to the development of good citizenship. The ability to encourage students to be critical consumers of discourse is essential to the development of a good education.

Educators must also remember that they are citizens of the polis, not philosopher-kings set above it. As such, educators need to commit themselves to the roles of student, citizen, and advocate as well. As I teach, I have the responsibility to model these positions as well by continuously studying, reflecting, learning, and advocating in the areas that I profess to my students.

I believe that my views of communication education fit well with the University's charge to create and sustain intellectually inspired, morally grounded, and globally minded practices of education and its goals to empower students to forge their lives well-rounded communicators who are aware of and respect human dignity and ethical values.

Statement of Research Philosophy Benjamin R. Bates

As I have stated in my teaching philosophy, I view communication as a communal art and practice. I carry this orientation into my research philosophy. Communication can serve as a mode of investigating the construction, alteration, and maintenance of our social world. As researchers, we must contribute to this ongoing investigation and invest our efforts in understanding effective communication practice and the implications that communication has for our communities. With Isocrates, I hold that those “who want to do some good in the world must banish utterly from their interests all vain speculations and all activities which have no bearing on our lives.”

I see my role as a researcher as being a person who investigates communicative texts, situations, and events for the purpose of better understanding how communication practice functions and how communication processes can be improved. I self-describe as an applied rhetorician. Above the study of communication acts as persuasive devices, the ethical and social implications of communication acts should also be explored. Researchers are members of a larger community of scholars and of humans. The applied rhetorician has the responsibility to contribute positively to his or her communities. Moreover, applied rhetoricians must be prepared to speak to that community and to audiences that can act as agents of change. As such, the rhetorician should consider two questions before embarking on any study: “Does my research have relevance to the larger community of which I am a part?” and “Will the findings of my research contribute to better practice in the future?” If the answer to both questions is, “Yes,” then I may study the topic, text, or event. And, if one does begin such a study, a third question emerges: “To what agents of change do I communicate my findings and how do I communicate them?”

I am open to and have worked within a broad set of research possibilities. Most of my research efforts have been within two domains. The first domain is health communication. The second is political rhetoric, particularly at the international level. These two areas both receive a positive answer when I pose my two questions. Both international affairs and health communication are relevant to the larger community. Health issues and their presentation to the public implicate questions of medical treatment and community understandings of treatment options. International affairs, particularly peace and conflict, have an impact on the world community, the cosmopolis in which we all live. Though it may seem that these two areas are unrelated, both share a common research goal. The aim of these research agendas is to provide analysis and interpretation that can better public policy. In addition, both arenas are part of a larger question of how people come to form their understandings of policy expediency and governmental justification in the public sphere. Approaching one question can yield insight into the other. Disparate medical access can inform the understanding of how economics and power operate generally, thus informing issues in the international public sphere. The tactics deployed in international policy can provide useful information about how tropes are used to present unfamiliar places and peoples, thus providing insight into how unfamiliar medical techniques and issues can be made familiar to consumers. Indeed, my analysis in the Journal of Medicine and Philosophy demonstrates that the discourse of health and the discourse of international war can be one and the same.

To best allow research to have relevance to the larger community and to contribute to better practice most effectively, it is essential that the communication scholar be prepared to approach discourse on its own terms. I am trained in and employ a variety of analytical and theoretical techniques. Much of my research draws on humanistic traditions of rhetoric. My work on presidential rhetoric as it is used to advocate military action draws on traditional views of rhetoric as described by Aristotle and Kenneth Burke. I have also drawn on psychoanalytic orientations, including Jungian, Lacanian, and Deleuzian perspective, for my work on film. I have deployed narrative concepts and concepts of genre. Other work has drawn on post-structural and post-Marxist orientations to assist in my analysis. In addition to humanistic investigations, I have drawn on social scientific paradigms. My work uses so-called “hard” social science methods of data collection and analysis ranging from the simple t-test to structural equation modeling. These investigations have followed a pattern where my partners and I first develop a message or intervention based on principles of rhetorical invention and then use quantitative methods to test the effects of these inventional techniques among actual audiences. I have also drawn on qualitative social scientific methods, including focus groups and observational study. I do not have a preferred methodology, as I believe that the methodology should be derived from the text or events under study, that communication can allow for emergent readings of communication to be performed, and that it is possible to test rhetorical principles with social scientific methods.

Once a topic has been identified and a theoretical approach decided upon and enacted, to best enact scholarship, the communication scholars must identify the audience to whom the findings should be communicated and how that audience should be addressed. Too often, communication scholarship is not read by the community or communities that would best benefit from the findings. Because communication scholars do not seek audiences other than communication scholars for their work, it should not be surprising that many of those outside of communication arts and science know little of what we do. Both these trends should be challenged. This is why the majority of my scholarship is not published in communication journals, but is communication scholarship published in other fields. If, for example, one wants to challenge dominant symbolic representations of health and healing to promote more effective and more ethical communication regarding rights, disability, or governance structures, then one must have their work read by the relevant agents of change.

Moreover, to have one’s work read by policymakers or health care providers, one must publish in policy journals and medical journals using the language of policy and medicine. One cannot expect the policymaker or health care provider to read Communication Monographs or Quarterly Journal of Speech, nor should the communication scholar expect to be understood (must less taken seriously) if she used communication jargon when she writes for this audience. In our chapter for the Handbook of Applied Communication Research, Celeste Condit and I make this argument even more forcefully: it is the duty of the communication scholar who claims to perform applied work to publish where agents of change will read the work and to adapt her methods, vocabulary, and writing style to that audience's needs. This is why my work on health and medicine appears in health and medical journals, uses the vocabulary of health and medicine, and uses methods accepted by physicians and health care providers. I regularly publish work in health and medical journals because these are the outlets read by agents of change.

I firmly believe that we should go to our audiences' fora and speak our audiences' languages if we are to have any hope of enacting real social change and contribute to the communities that pay for the academy and for our positions as researchers.
