‘International justice’ emerges from, and is shaped by, several areas of international law, policy, and practice – international human rights law, humanitarian law and international criminal law – and has various dimensions. It may pursue the accountability of a range of state, non-state and individual actors and the reparation, in a broad sense, of victims, survivors and others. This course explores the multiple overlapping dimensions and current issues related to international justice: the underlying normative frameworks, the processes and methods through which justice is pursued, strategic questions regarding the impact of such processes, and the legal, political and practical challenges arising.

David Crane is the Glidden Visiting Professor at Ohio University 2018/2019. He holds a Juris Doctor degree from Syracuse University, a Masters of Arts Degree in African Studies and a Bachelor of General Studies in History, summa cum laude, from Ohio University and holds a Doctor of Letters (honoris causa) also from Ohio University, among other honorary degrees from various universities.